C. A. Prosser Urges State Aid for Industrial and Vocational Schools

Speaking last night before a large audience in the John Marshall H. School on vocational and industrial training in the public schools, C. Prosser, secretary of the Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education, said that State education said that state aid was especially needed for such work. He said that people are just awakening to the fact that it is wise to educate the few for leadership in all departments, it is also wise and just to educate the masses for service under them. He suggested the

Richmond there be a survey of the industries here and then that the school gain the support of the labor organizations, Chamber of Commerce, Business Men's Club and other associations of mutual benefit, so that a vocation

Charles H. Winslow, statistician of the United States Bureau of Labor, spoke of the success of such vocational schools as have already been established. He referred to a German school which, starting with six pupils, had has 100 teachers. He said that American boys would readily take up industrial training as they would soon recognize that it would lead them to greater and better things.
